

These Evergreens Offer You Lasting Beauty and Variety

EVERYONE will be using lots of evergreen this year for all kinds of home decoration, and even on Christmas packages and for party favors. You'll find that you can have more fun, as well as greater success in using them, if you can identify the various types of evergreen and use each type to the best advantage.

It really isn't difficult to tell them apart, although you may be a little confused at first by the obvious similarities. But the differences are just as great, and the accompanying picture will help you to distinguish at a glance some of the outstanding ones.

To the beginner all evergreens are "some kind of pine," so let's start with the pines. You can easily remember that all evergreens that have needles belong to the pine family. But don't call them all pines! The pine trees themselves bear their needles in bunches of two, three or five, and the needles are long, straight and sharp-pointed. The white pine (E) has bunches of five needles that look like stiff brushes. At first glance the white fir (G) may look to you like a pine. But if you know more closely you will see that the fir needles are borne singly. They are flat, and when they fall they leave a smooth, bare stem. The most popular Christmas tree is a fir, the balsam fir. The spruce also bears its needles singly instead of in bunches, like the
